

How many approved strings should be required for a Translation Contributor to get a polyglots badge?			Should Polyglots badges expire?
Response	Other Text	Comments	Response	Comments
One string			No
More than ten strings			Yes
More than ten strings		When is a contributor a contributor?	No	I think it is better for quality ;)
More than ten strings		To have a badge, you have to work constantly, not seldom.	Yes
Ten strings			Yes
Ten strings			Yes
	thousands		Yes
Ten strings		If the person translates 10 strings, gets the badge and then never translates again, will the badge remain in place?	Yes	Since WordPress is an ongoing project, it seems only fair that the person continues contributing.
Ten strings			No
Ten strings			Yes
Ten strings			No
More than ten strings		translate.wp.org has a lot of projects, therefore it's really easy to get over a dozen translation suggestions going. My vote is 25 accepted string for a badge.	Yes	Badges should not expire, but users should be able to get a new badge to their collection each year. This way, previous work is glorified, but there's an incentive to continue working and one can judge if a contributor is in a legacy hall of fame or currently involved in the project.
One string		I think that making contribution is a bit deal and not everyone does that. We should greet any little step in into community.	No	I'd say this should be for life, as Olympics medal - once you've done contribution community should welcome that and show that this person added value for community.
More than ten strings		25' strings or more	Yes
	More than 100	There are some strings harder to translate than others, very short strings, etc I think increasing the number can leverage this	No
More than ten strings		I've seen random drive-bys where users have translated 10 or fewer strings, and never to be seen again.	Yes	Otherwise it's just too easy!
	Five strings	Awarding initiative is important, so the number shouldn't be too high. But it should be more than one to avoid drive-by box-ticking.	No	Props in WordPress Core don't expire. Once you've contributed code to WordPress, you always have that. I think the same should apply to contributing a translation.
One string			No
Ten strings			Yes	by active meaning that the contributor has translated strings currently used by wordpress. obsolete translations and removed strings should count against this
Ten strings			No
One string			No
Ten strings			No
One string			No
One string			No

Ten strings		For languages with many active translators, it's not super easy to get 10 approved translations. If the badges have an expiration date, 10 sounds like a good amount.	Yes	I think letting the badge expire after one year is fair (3 release cycles), especially if the threshold for earning the badge is not very high.
Ten strings		Urge people to continue contributions with an early reward	No	No. Or at least after a year of inactivity, which it will show up again with one approved string
More than ten strings			No
Ten strings			No
More than ten strings			No
Ten strings			Yes	Whenever the Translation Contributor has under 10 strings approved in the current projects.
	More than ten strings. More than one session/release/batch	We have contributors in acknowledgement, that may have lifted a lot in the past, but haven't been involved in the community for years. And others that have contributed a lot in recent releases, but don't get acknowledgement yet, because others have translated more in the past.	Yes	Active contributor have contributed within two years. Expiration is after two. Or maybe five years. Maybe we could think about having a "Hall of fame" or "Former rockstars" section in the bottom of the acknowledgement page.
More than ten strings			Yes
More than ten strings			Yes	If translator has not been active for 3 major releases, remove the badge.
	Gold, silver, etc badges	Gold for someone who translated more than a half of the strings, silver for 100 and other for more than 10 strings.	No
	50		Yes	You must have been an active contributor the last 12 months.
	30	It is a bit of effort to get going, but whilst you at it, do at least a couple to show, as a contributor, you are into it. To translate 30 strings to get a badge is still easier to get than any of the other badges.	Yes	I think 24 months is reasonable. If you sign up to the project it makes sense to continue being an active 'team member'. Otherwise some locales might end up with loads of people 'badged' but not much activity in the actual translating process.
Ten strings		There are people out there who just spot a typo. I want to make them recurrent translators and with this very low barrier, they have to collect at least 10 translations, which is easily achieved and if just approved translations count this will guarantee well made translations (instead of of just one "copy from original" for an Plugin-URL for example).	Yes	I think we should have two sets of badges (maybe the grayscale version from the badges above). Inactive contributors get the grayscale version, but they do not lose the badge. Active contributors could be all translation contributors/editors who suggested or approved/rejected at least one string in the last core version. Or better: in all still supported core versions (three versions back, I think). This should reflect the real situation for most of the locales.
	6 strings	Quite some projects only have 6 strings (readme files). I'd say that completely translating one of those would suffice to get a badge.	Yes	An active contributor is someone who has successfully translated at least X strings in the last 6 months. This should allow everyone to keep their badge valid, since there (usually) are two WordPress Core releases every six months, yet motivates to contribute regularly.
Ten strings			No
One string		Everyone who contributes to the translations of WordPress should be rewarded.	No
One string		Hard to say. If it is about encouraging people to contribute, give them a badge from their first contribution. If it is about showing merits, provide badges to those, who at least contributed to two major releases.	No	Just sounds silly to provide a badge and take it away after some time.
Ten strings			No
More than ten strings		It motivates more strings to translate and be consistent in translations	No
More than ten strings			No

More than ten strings			No
One string			No
Ten strings			Yes	If the stings are no longer in the current versions they should expire.
More than ten strings			Yes
Ten strings		Create an incentive to merely fixing one sole typo	No
Ten strings			No
		Ten is probably very easy. 100 strings keeps translators challenged enough to continue contributing.	Yes	Here is what I think: 6 months of inactivity (that is, no translations contributed) will expire the badge. 10 new approved translations earn the badge back. Similarly for badges for Translation Editors: Gain a badge on reviewing 500 strings (approvals/rejections/new translations). It expires with 6 months of inactivity. And, reviewing 100 strings (approvals/rejections/new translations) earn the editor badge back.
		We should make sure that badges are awarded to people who have actually spent at least a certain amount of time translating.	Yes	An active contributor would be one that has participated in translations in the last couple of years.
Ten strings		One string is not enough, there are some users which only translate URLs etc. to test GlotPress.	Yes	10 strings in the last year.
		Translations need commitment. Less than 20 would be too few to warrant a badge. More than 100 is a bit high up as a challenge. 100 seems fair: both interested enough in translating, and easy to grasp.	No	As long as their translation is used, they should have the badge. Now, if their contribution is lost/reworded, that's another issue...
More than ten strings			No
Ten strings			No
More than ten strings			No
More than ten strings			Yes	Active in X number of last releases.
Ten strings			No
More than ten strings			Yes	after a year
One string		Thanks for your contribution, every contribution counts :)	Yes	Once a translation contributor has not had a translation included in the past 3 current releases I think the badge should be removed. I don't think Translation Editors badges should expire though (Maybe after 3 years of nothing active, not really sure on this one or what the actual figure should be)